

EMORY JONES HOUSE

Although its exterior chimneys have now vanished the structural framing and 18th/ century woodwork definitely establishes this as a mid 18th. century structure. It is three bays in length having a gambrell roof and hall and parlor floor plan that is partitioned laterally.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Emery Jones House is not large (23' x 20') and is almost square in plan. Partitions yield two rooms down and three above. It is three bays wide and two and one half stories high. Side windows are irregularly placed, are 6/6 and appear to retain much old glass. There are shed dormers in the front (S). The present chimney is small, and there is evidence that the house once contained a larger chimney on the east side. This possibility is suggested by the fenestration. The large fireplace which remains inside as well as what has been found at the other gambrel houses, in the area.

Materials used and methods of construction suggest at least a Mid 18th Century building date. On 7/13/76, the house appeared to be in poor shape, the following was observed.

Where the porch joins the caves on the south facade; it is collapsing thus exposing hand-hewn timbers joined with rose-head nails.

Cut nails were pulled from the siding which is beveled tongue-and-groove.

Sills appear to be hewn and joined by mortise-and-tenon with trunnels.

The partition between the south and north rooms on the first floor contains beaded paneling 14" - 15" wide.

In the north room (kitchen), there is a wooden mantel piece, 4'10" wide containing four carved rectangles.

The mantel in the south (front) room appears to have had dentils at one time.

Doors upstairs are both batten doors with clinched nails and panelled doors assembled with wooden pegs.

The rooms upstairs are partitioned east and west by vertical beaded panels.

Door sills appear to be pegged.

15" wide floor boards in upstairs hall.

The upstairs is reached by a stairs which takes a 90° turn that is located in the southeast corner of the front room. It is put together with wooden pegs.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

In his book, Early American Architecture, H. Morrison points out that Maryland is one of the areas in which the gambrel roof represents an English tradition, which in America pre-dates that of the Dutch. The Emery Jones House is a visual document of that tradition and consequently shares a certain ancestry with Red Hall, Elton Head Manor (demolished) and La Viel House. The large, wooden shingled gambrel gives a striking appearance in each of these houses.
